The University of Illinois at Chicago wants President Obama to bring his future presidential library to the city campus, USA TODAY has learned.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for UIC, confirmed to USA TODAY on Friday that Chancellor Paula Allen-Meares decided in May to form a university exploratory committee to look into bidding for the library and museum that will be built after Obama leaves office. Burton said he had no details about who is on the exploratory committee or what, if any, actions they have taken thus far in their pursuit.

Allen-Meares declined to comment.

So far Obama hasn't offered any clues as to where Chicago has thrown its hat into the ring of institutions vying to be the future site of Obama's presidential library and museum.

UIC announced the bid for the library Sunday with a university spokesman saying it is one of "at least five sites" on its Near West Side campus, the recommendation of a task force of deans, faculty members and administrators who agreed that UIC's diversity, research and history make it uniquely appropriate for the library and museum to honor Obama's legacy," UIC Chancellor Paula Allen-Meares said.

UIC would make a bid for the library and museum. UIC is the only university in Chicago (where the Obama Presidential Library would be located) that has a school for more than a decade; Chicago State University is the only other university in the city that has a school in the old Michael Reese Hospital in Bronzeville.

Obama has no formal ties to UIC or Chicago State University. In addition to being near Obama's private South Side home, UIC notes many potential library donors in Obama's network, including his former strategist, David Axelrod, recently reported by Politico.

UIC is kicking up its campaign for an Obama library, with the university already having tapped an architectural standout, Skidmore, OWINGS & Merrill, to assess sites near the campus.

UIC is also considering a presidential library and museum, UIC Chancellor Paula Allen-Meares said. Christopher Kennedy notes such institutions can be a boon to the local community. Ultimately, the choice is entirely up to Obama.

Valerie Jarrett, the first couple's matchmaker, early political patron and Obama whisperer, sensed a hot property.

Side have also been discussed.
