GRADUATE AND PROFESSIONAL PROGRAMS

Dean Dutta provided an overview of the history of graduate and professional education in the United States, which he said was modeled after the German education system created by Wilhelm von Humboldt. He reviewed the history of graduate and professional education at the University of Illinois, and provided enrollment data for these programs. He explained the purpose and importance of graduate and professional education, and discussed the balance between research and the graduate student. He said that in the past, emphasis was placed on research, but greater focus is currently placed on students and the need to prepare them to succeed in their careers. He added that he believes that more emphasis will be placed on mentoring in the future, and said that the current national discourse in graduate and professional education is focusing on accountability, broadening participation, financing, and globalization. Committee members discussed students' degree completion rates at the University, and President Hogan suggested that these statistics should be compared to data available from peer institutions in the Committee on Institutional Cooperation (CIC). Dr. Carroll asked about statistics regarding diversity, and Dr. Rao provided the materials that were distributed at the committee meeting held on May 19, 2010. Additional discussion included the composition of the graduate college executive committee and reasons that international students may not remain in the United States upon completion of their graduate work.

Dr. Gillet described e-Learning initiatives at the Chicago campus, which he said include blended courses and online programs. He referred to an information technology task force that has been formed in support of online education, and provided examples of student success resulting from blended courses. He also mentioned former Global Campus programs that are now managed through the School of Continuing Studies and provided enrollment statistics for these programs. Lastly, he described some of the opportunities that have been provided to students as a result of programs that they completed online.

Ms. Hasara then asked Dr. Raymond Schroeder to provide an overview of e-Learning at Springfield. Dr. Schroeder presented statistics related to online courses and programs that are currently offered, and referred to an integration of online and on-campus courses at Springfield. He stated that the campus is nationally recognized for its online work and has received several awards.
